Listen to a dialog between Clara and Ben and mark the sentences true (T) or false (F).

- (T) Clara is probably a writer for the school blog.
- (F) Clara and Ben have the same idea about being successful.
- (T) In Ben's opinion, helping people is the key to success.
- (F) Clara thinks Ben should stop playing basketball.

Clara: Hi, Ben. Are you busy? Can I interview you for the school blog?
Ben: An interview? Why me?
Clara: We're writing about students who are doing great things. And you just won the award for best basketball player in the state. You scored the most points this season.
Ben: I was lucky.
Clara: Don't put yourself down. You are really good.
Ben: You know that I'm not going to play professionally after school.
Clara: That's a pity, but you can't say you were not successful as a player.
Ben: That depends on your idea of success.
Clara: You are the best on the team. The other players respect you. You have lots of fans. Isn't that enough?
Ben: Not for me. I think the most important thing is to help other people. A person who helps others is successful.
Clara: Don't you help people now?
Ben: Let's say I could do more. I like basketball, but I don't think I'm really helping anyone.
Clara: I think you want too much, but that makes you interesting. So, are you going to give me the interview or not?
Ben: What for? You know everything about me.
Clara: Okay, we can skip the basics, but you have to answer a quick quiz. I give you two options, and you choose one.
Ben: All right, shoot.

Fear of failure is one of the biggest things holding people back from reaching their goals, but the truth is, everyone fails at some point.
In 2017, J.K. Rowling—author of the Harry Potter series—was worth over a billion dollars after selling more than 450 million books. But her success didn't come easily. Twelve major publishers turned down her first book, and at the time, she felt like a failure. She was a single mom and jobless, struggling with depression and depending on government support to get by.
Abraham Lincoln, considered by many to be one of the greatest U.S. presidents, dealt with failure throughout his life. He came from a very poor family, lost eight elections, had two businesses fail, and even spent six months in bed after a mental health crisis. He never got rich, but no one can say he wasn't successful.
Today, Disney is loved by kids and adults everywhere, making billions from movies, merchandise, and theme parks. But Walt Disney's himself had a rough start. Early on, an editor fired him for "lacking imagination and good ideas." After that, he started several companies that didn't last, and he even went bankrupt at one point.
Failing is a normal part of life. What makes successful people different is that they keep going—they stay persistent and determined to reach their goals.

Choose the correct alternative.
